Although there are some limitations in the interpretation of the data from the SWOG trial, especially as it relates to post-interventional evaluation in a mixed cohort of non-squamous cell non-small cell lung cancer patients, it is important to note that the patients in that trial seemed to respond better to multimodality treatment and that the OS seemed to be longer when chemotherapy was given concurrent with surgery and radiation. When we compare the outcome of the EORTC trial with that of other trials conducted at our institution and described in the literature, it seems that multimodality treatment (preoperative chemotherapy and postoperative adjuvant therapy) could result in similar outcomes compared to those of conventional surgery and postoperative therapy, especially in non-squamous cell non-small cell lung cancer. Future research may focus on: 1) the exploration of more effective neoadjuvant and postoperative therapies based on further pre-clinical studies, such as chemotherapy combined with targeted agents; 2) the study of the regimens used in the present study to determine whether such regimens could be administered in a neoadjuvant setting; and 3) a biological evaluation to test whether the pathophysiology of the tumor influences the outcome of surgery and radiation. COMMENTS ===== Background ----- Neoadjuvant chemotherapy (NAC) and concurrent chemoradiotherapy (CCRT) are used to treat locally advanced non-small cell lung cancer, as postoperative adjuvant therapy for small cell lung cancer, and for the treatment of patients with unresectable lung cancer to shrink the tumor and permit resection. Postoperative adjuvant therapy is used in large-cell carcinoma to reduce locoregional recurrence. NAC is used to assess the response to neoadjuvant treatment and the extent of the disease in order to plan surgery and adjuvant therapy. Although preoperative treatment, including CCR
