D'Void by Steven Fein (Five Rivers Press, 1997. Printed as a limited edition by Elisabeth Robinson, 1997.) Even if you can't imagine any reason why you would need another definition of the term rubber toy, D'Void has a number of truly massive toys that should certainly interest even the stoutest of rubber rejects. In fact, if you want to prove how opposite your interests are to mine, D'Void is the perfect place to start. Created in 1995 by a pair of graduate students at the Illinois Institute of Technology's School of Architecture, the company operates somewhere between Andy Warhol's Factory and Madame Alexander's. As Jonathan Harris notes in his 1997 Interior Design review of the firm in Chicago, D'Void is "the farthest thing I can imagine in terms of products coming out of a design studio." When he first saw the D'Void group show, Harris looked around for the name and discovered it was known only to the staff. Group show D'Void Harris's description of D'Void as even more brilliant than Warhol's Factory is an understatement, yet despite the leap into animation character and critters that moves D'Void beyond the toy into the realm of the Disneyesque, the group's products reflect the company's projective-actionist approach, and have been described as "a conceptual pop-surreal take on material systems." Taking an idea and looping it backward and forward in time until the element at which it comes to a standstill is usually a dead end for art or pop. What propels D'Void's toys, and odd material palettes as well, is not economy or inventiveness, but formal shifts that permit certain possibilities that others forbade. In D'Void this approach becomes a kind of conscious opposition to contemporary toy design. Not typical toys As we have seen, Harris suggests, individual toy designers mimic the development of material they apply to a biodegradable rubber base. D'Void's product development is, however, completely different, and less predictable. Without relinquishing any of the material expression that has made its reputation, D'Void works with plants and animals, and its products are
