This invention relates generally to test devices which measure electrical characteristics of semiconductor devices and, in particular, to a test device designed to rapidly, precisely and accurately measure current through a semiconductor device. Modern electronic circuits are built from semiconductor devices integrated onto a semiconductor substrate such as silicon, gallium arsenide, germanium or indium phosphide. Integrated circuits can be designed, constructed and tested using a variety of processing and fabrication techniques well known to those skilled in the art. After fabrication, the circuits must be tested before being used in products or in other applications. Testing is typically accomplished by connecting test probes to bond pads on the circuits to be tested. The test probes are then used to stimulate the bond pads of the circuits to be tested and/or to receive output signals from the circuits. In recent years, a new type of probe has been introduced to the semiconductor industry. In contrast to probes used in previous generations of semiconductor products, these new probes are specially designed to measure electrical currents rather than voltages. FIG. 1 shows a representative prior art device 20 designed to measure a current 22 through a semiconductor device 24. Device 20 is sold by Lam Research Corporation of Fremont, Calif. The device shown in FIG. 1 consists of a rigid planar base 26, a conductive electrode 28, a ground electrode 30, a semiconductor test structure 32 which includes a measuring electrode 34 and a protective diode 36, and a tip member 38. Device 20 operates as follows: Base 26 is positioned on top of the semiconductor device 24 with electrodes 28 and 30 disposed to contact the top surface of the semiconductor device 24.
