EBOOK Book Tittle Public Sector Accounting, Sixth Edition Author Rowan Jones and A. Q: Using a class member function in a macro results in "undefined reference" I'm working on a library which is going to be used through my projects and I'm having some trouble making a function inside a class visible to a macro. I have a definition like this in my header file: inline int myfunction(double t, int kind){...} And a definition like this inside my.cpp file: #ifndef MYLIBRARY_H #define MYLIBRARY_H class MyClass { public: MyClass() { } int myfunction(double t, int kind); }; #endif And inside my macro: #define MYLIBRARY #include #define MYFUNCTION(x) x::myfunction(x, x) My function is defined inside my header file, but I still get this error: undefined reference to myfunction in the compilation. Why is this and how can I fix it? A: The global macro MYFUNCTION just expands to the function name. It does not resolve anything. There are a few ways to get around this: Put the declaration of the myfunction function first in the header, then use #include to include it into the.cpp file. Use a friend declaration, where the name of the friend must be visible in the definition of the class, otherwise the function is not visible there. So from the declaration in the header it should be enough to put just the header file in there, without any definition. I assume you don't want to give the class's name in the header. If you need the name of the class in the header then you have to do a
