The recent use of time-resolved laser-induced fluorescence (TRLIF) has been extended to fundamental, cellular, and molecular studies. The instrumentation required for TRLIF includes a picosecond pulsed laser system, an optical delay line, and a sensitive CCD detector, which can measure fluorescence emission intensity and time-resolved fluorescence decay profiles. Its advantages and disadvantages for biomedical research are discussed. The main advantages of this technique are (1) being an effective tracer of protein-protein interactions in living cells and tissues at high resolution and (2) providing continuous labeling of rapidly moving molecules in cells and tissues with high resolution. Its disadvantages include the requirement of at least one picosecond pulsed laser and technical difficulties of instrumentation and operator skills.
