In order to support this new common tool for Graphic designers, we have been working with the web technologies community to establish a standard language and API that allows us to more easily bring creative assets and content into web applications. For example, in 2020, we will bring a web-native version of Photoshop that works on any web browser. We are also working to deliver a photosharing site (similar to Facebook or Pinterest) that will enable mobile users to publish to any device and also deliver content from poorly supported destinations. We also see the opportunity to build new solutions that reduce the learning curve and support new audiences. For example, I'm excited about our upcoming development of Firefox Quantum, a new web browser that enables people to enjoy a whole new level of web content and application experiences. This new browser will combine the power of the web with the flexibility of a native browser, allowing anyone to interact with content, send emails, and even bring mobile devices into the browser like never before.
