The new Face Auto Settings panel, on the Retouch tab, enables you to quickly process a group of faces, eyes, and noses for depth, blur, and other effects. An automatic face from either an online service or person in your photo can be used. New UI enhancements include a new bottom dock for finer granularity control of image adjustments. You can now create a copy window position with a grid that can be moved, rotated, and sized manually. This feature can be applied to layers by selecting a face, a line, stars, or text, and then choosing the "Apply Lighting Match" tool and setting its color to the lighting in the image. In a quick-select mode, you can choose a face, a line, or a selection in the image, and use it as a lighting match. I've no idea why Lightroom doesn't include a new feature like this, as it makes a lot of sense. "Apply Lighting Match" now groups objects under a new tool called Adjust Lighting Settings. In my testing, it seemed a little slow, but one thing that is missing is the ability to apply lighting to more than one layer at a time. With the CTB 9650 printer from Brother, I was able to yield some pretty great results simply by changing a few settings on my computer and connecting the printer to Photoshop Elements. At $199 for the printer and a one-year subscription to the cloud-based Easy-to-Print Service, this could be a compelling choice for both small businesses and home users who want to create their own digital materials on a greater scale than ever before. Of course, the printer needs to be paired with a computer or other device capable of driving print jobs, which are not always out of the question. One manufacturer that has been making printers with wireless printing capabilities is Epson. The company has a line of home and small to medium business printers that offer 32-bit color printing up to 4,800 x 3,600 dpi. Check out our Best Inkjet Printers 2020 review for more information.
