As you would expect, Photoshop has to be better. Not because it has to draw millions of pixels and may be launching as many as seven or more processes on top of one another, but because it has to be more interactive. Fine-tune the highlights and shadows in your document for the best possible look. You can render highlights and shadows in separate layers, each with its own color and adjustment controls, or you can apply standard global adjustments to both areas. Adobe offers several options for how you work with files. In the Design menus, you can export a file as an AFP, push it to the Web, or make a PDF. Options for making layers and doing on-screen cloning are in the Edit menus; options for creating image sequence, Word documents, or HTML are in the Image menus. Adobe provides a great library of standard adjustments and effects, but if you want something a little more specialized, you can open it into a DFX file, or you can make a plug-in of your own. There are literally dozens of plug-ins for Photoshop, and more are being created all the time.
