It's easy to adopt the new "Photoshop CC Design Tools". I could accept the new design and layout if I didn't have to deal with the cumbersome editing process using only a keyboard with Photoshop, and that is something that I have always been asked to do. Photoshop CC's natural evolution does not make it easier to navigate or edit your image, it just adds quite a few tweaks to the available tools. The Natural Type and Glamour are at least familiar, but I wish they were accessible through the Image menu (or from a new context menu). You can't drag and drop or copy/paste in the same way, and as much as I like having my exposure and contrast set directly on the image, I don't want to use it when I am doing my usual edits or brush. You can change those settings in the Layers' menu, but that's not an option I want to click every time I need to adjust my image. There is a problem with Adobe's support. Essential functionality does not work if you are using two computers on the network, and having to change a Photoshop setting in the first computer and sync it back to that setting in the other computer is a pain. I like the Smart Sharpen filters and use them often, but when I am working with a Photoshop file, I usually try to switch off Smart Sharpen filters and use my own sharpening settings, especially for portraits. If you've read my other articles about XNaked, you will remember that I am only a third-party user of Lightroom 6 with a good number of Lightroom plug-ins, resulting in some missing or incorrect behaviors using Lightroom with Photoshop. I really like the new presets and tool options in Photoshop, but I have some discomfort with the fact that you cannot customize the styles on the Photoshop engine itself.

You'll also be able to use live filters to change an image's color without having to install a large number of filters. This is one of those things that the pros use in order to get a final look quickly. You may have already used it in a web design project. Adobe has built in a few filters in Photoshop CC 2020, such as iridescent or glow. These filters can be added directly to a layer or painted onto an image. You can also customize the filter's settings for different uses, allowing you to create a custom look. There's also a layer feature that enables you to work with locator masks. These will be familiar to many Photoshop users, but you'll be able to use them for more precise control. You can also apply a mask to any area of an image, which can be great for almost any design project. And you can even bake a mask into your web designs using the link feature and masks. Another exciting new feature that is coming to Photoshop CC 2020 is the ability to use your own custom brush. You can create and save brushes, tweak their settings, and use them as normal strokes or selections. This will help you create even color and texture variations pretty quickly and easily. Detail and Adjustment Layers (DALs) are a great way to change how a layer appears. If you create a new layer and align it to another layer that has a similar color, shape, or pattern, you can use the New Adjustment Layer dialog box to change how the two look together. For example, if you duplicate a pattern layer and align it to the background, you can quickly change how the two layers appear.
