Self-Assessed Health and Dementia in Older Adults: A Multimorbidity Analysis. Eighty-five elderly people with dementia and 87 elderly people without dementia were administered a series of questionnaires designed to assess the associations between self-assessed health and several types of health morbidity. Participants also completed self-report questionnaires about their perception of the impact of their health on their lives. The results showed that elderly people with dementia consistently reported a higher prevalence of poor self-assessed health than elderly people without dementia.

(p Viroids or 'viroid nucleic acids', or viroids are a class of non-coding RNA molecules (RNAs) which are small (about 300-400 bases), infectious, and have no coded RNAs (genes). Viroids comprise a virus-like genome that only codes for its own replication. Some viroid genomes are very stable. Others require the help of an external helper nucleic acid for replication. For some viroid species, it has been shown that the helper can be a single-stranded RNA, and that more than one helper species may be needed for some viroid species. To date, seven different viroid genera have been identified. Some viroid species present a small circular DNA (consisting of only one or two single-stranded RNAs) and a circular RNA (referred to as a viroid) is generated from the small circular DNA. Other viroid species contain a single-stranded circular genome, and a small circular RNA (also called a viroid) is generated from the single-stranded genome. A third type of viroid comprises a single-stranded RNA and a small circular DNA (or DNA replicon) is generated from the single-stranded RNA (see FIG. 1, genome). A fourth type of viroid comprise a single
