Every image you shoot in RAW with another software than Photoshop CS6 is lost in the final result. It is possible to save the images as JPEG or TIFF files and export it as JPG or PNG files after editing but there is a big gap in quality comparing to editing with your RAW files. This update shows more clearly how support for Windows 8 is becoming more and more important for Adobe. As previously reviewed by the EIC, FandF's, and The Digital Photography Review, web-based options to Photoshop's powerful features offer some real advantages for photo editors. The web-based options for Photoshop Elements on the web are limited to what Adobe provides in Terms of Features for web versions of the software. Photoshop's features on the web are far superior to what is offered on the macOS version. Photoshop Elements 8.0 for web is just that—Elements below the feature level of 8.0 on the Windows version. Most web-based editors can't emulate the power of native macOS software. And web-based editors such as Pixlr Photo Editor (web version), Adobe's own software, and several others are still a step or two behind the macOS version when it comes to quality. In addition, the quality of web-based tools for apps is often inconsistent. For those who don't wish to invest in Photoshop, Elements, or Photoshop Elements, the web is not the answer.
