Part of the update was the addition of Creative Cloud Libraries. These let you create separate catalogs for different projects, with specific versions of a project stored in the catalog with the same naming conventions as other versions. So you could create a Landscape kit that only includes the truly important D800 versions, a Mini-Camp kit, a very special client contract kit, etc. Optical image-editing software is not really my field, and so I can only look at the end results, but if Adobe does employ some of the more efficient computer programming techniques that pretty much every mainstream enterprise software uses today, the Photoshop should be faster than it is in the current version. With the latest update, it is clearly a must for everyone who makes use of the company's annual subscription. The new changes in software look good to me, but my perception obviously isn't the only one that matters, and in this case, Adobe needs to improve the basic speed of Importing, Exporting, and regular editing. What is it: With the purchase of an Adobe subscription, you then subscribe to the Creative Cloud bundle. The current cost is only $60. In a nutshell, CCA includes over 50 Adobe-supplied applications. You can use it alongside other Adobe CC applications, such as Photoshop or Illustrator, and benefit from some UI integration features. This is a very rich suite, and there is a lot to take in here, so it will take a while to explore everything that CCA has to offer.
