The objective of this work was to study the production of biopharmaceuticals under the assumptions of perfect price competition. The work was initiated by investigating the economic mechanisms behind the production of the interferon-alpha-2a. Structural identification of this process via a combination of production functions and stochastic frontier models showed that product quality, first in time (production and raw material costs), and second in quantity (production and inventory costs) dominated the production process. It was not possible to distinguish between the assumption of product quality or inventory costs being dominant. This result proved the need of a statistical framework for studying the production of biopharmaceuticals. A Bayesian approach to structural identification was developed and applied to study the economic structures of four recombinant biopharmaceutical production processes: interferon-alpha-2a, interferon-alpha-2b, interferon-gamma, and granulocyte colony-stimulating factor. Results showed that under the assumption of perfect price competition, interferon
